FOREWORD

When the iron horses were puffing up steep grades and dashing across the plains of America, tons of black ore was mined out of the hills in Corral Hollow. The miners earned a few dollars a day, then rode rail cars or walked home to their families in the towns of Carnegie, Ellis, Altamont and Tesla. They lived in crude tents or cabins but these towns included schools, churches, hotels, libraries and saloons.

Near what is now today Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory on a hillside, investors spent millions on a huge coal mine and railroad. Later a large brick and pottery factory was built as clay deposits were discovered in the area. A grain mill was established in 1869.

When the mines petered out the towns disappeared. Many immigrants had been attracted to the thriving area. Some stayed a few weeks, others a lifetime.

Friends and relations wrote to the immigrants in care of General Delivery. The Livermore Herald listed those who had not picked up their mail within a certain period of time.

If your ancestor was a miner, brick or pottery worker, oil driller, or farmer you may find him here among these pages. Remember, the newspapers did not always report on the poor and downtrodden unless they got in a fight or stole something! So don't be disappointed!

In searching for information on my family, I employed students to extract the births, marriages and deaths from the Livermore Herald, a weekly newspaper, from 1899 to 1913. (Some of 1902 issues are missing.)

RURAL ROUTE DIRECTORY

The Herald is indebted to Rural Carrier Geo. K. Taylor for the following complete list of persons receiving their mail over the local rural route. The list is given in the order of the box numbers and includes the heads of households, their families, and those who make their permanent homes with the various families. The list is printed for the benefit of merchants and others who have business and social dealings with the families of the eastern and northern sections of the valley.
