Online Family Trees

Online trees make sharing your family history simple. You can use information, sources, photos, and other text to describe the lives of your ancestors. You can create an online tree simply by importing the information from your personal genealogy database. Also, you can allow specific family members to help you build and refine the online tree. Despite the many advantages of online trees, they are not a substitute for having your own personal database. Online trees and a personal database serve different purposes. This presentation will explain the why and how of creating an online tree, with several no-cost options.

Janet Brigham is a writer/editor and behavioral scientist who has applied her skills to genealogy research. She is editor of the PastFinder newsletter, which has been named best genealogy newsletter in the U.S. three times by the National Genealogical Society. She has taught numerous classes and workshops on family history topics. She is married to professional genealogist Richard D. Rands.
